Administering to safeguard the landscape

Having taken note of the existing regulatory framework in force and the recent constitutional guidelines issued on the safeguarding of landscapes, this study intends to examine the problems associated with administrative law that Regions have to tackle when managing landscaping restrictions and putting together landscaping plans.

The recent changes to the Code of the Cultural and Landscape Heritage have left many doubts unresolved concerning its interpretation and it is the aim of this investigation to provide contributions of a legal nature that will highlight the problems that local government will experience in this area. Problems such as the reconciling of public and private interests, or which powers will the regions be called upon to exercise within the current legislative framework.
